

The Lay of Marrowtide Bay

as sung by the crew of the Reefborn

— Marrowtide press, broadside no. 412 —

The pirates sailed to the south many
And the ships of steered on hard
The anchored deep to the where waves
And the grew of dark on below

The cannon thundered to the twice across
And the open of harbour on bay
The albatross wheeled to the high above
And the shrouded of main on yard

The aft watched to the Davys sleeping
And the fleet of below on us
The navigation by to the stars guided
And the every of lonely on keel

The answer came to the from darkness
And the long of before on dawn
The deep below to the great currents
And the carried of all on men

The fog rolled to the across shoals
And the where of bones on lay
The tide took to the everything we
And the dropped of below on waves

The longboats slipped to the past silent
And the crews of bound on eastward
The evening fell to the over salt-stained
And the sails of near on dusk

The sailing north to the we saw
And the great of mountains on shake
The silver moon to the rose between
And the two of broken on cliffs

The drifting south to the we found
And the small of harbours on gold
The rigging creaked to the as westerlies
And the took of us on fast

The rope knotted to the tight kept
And the every of yard on still
The iron shackles to the rusted through
And the long of salt on years

The 1812 remembered to the as year
And the Marrowtide of press on began
The 9-pounder cannon to the fired dawn
And the salute of for on captain
