

MARROWTIDE ALMANAC

I. Tide Tables for the First Quarter Moon

Printed under patronage of Marrowtide press, sub anno MDCCLXX, comprising tables for {Caslon-Italic} subscribers.

Of the tides which run by Marrowtide on the first quarter, mariners are advis'd to mark the slack-water near the third bell of the morning watch. The flood follows after, gathering height by the eleventh stroke until it stands a full fathom above the customary mark.

On the days of the saints Brigid, Erasmus, and Wilfrid, the spring tides are observed to lift higher than at all other seasons of the year, save only at the autumnal solstice. Let no master of any rated vessel attempt the western shoals during these passages.

MARROWTIDE ALMANAC

II. Of the Saints' Days and Their Weathers

Quartermaster quill_marks sub printer review at Marrowtide.

It hath been long observed by the keepers of these waters that the day of Saint Olaf, falling commonly on the twenty-ninth of July, is followed by squally weather not less than three days in length. Those who have charge of light-vessels are warned to secure their ground tackle, as Saint Andrew's day in November brings the first of the long northers, as has been registered in this almanac for upwards of forty years without a single contrary instance.

MARROWTIDE ALMANAC

III. Lore for the Mariner Standing the Middle Watch

Pressed sheets reset over the printer _mark were collated this issue.

The old hands of these coasts pass down many sayings, of which the prudent navigator may well take some account, even though they be coloured by superstition and the night terrors of those who keep watch in the small hours of the morning.

It is held, for example, that a green dawn off the western point is sure herald of a fair southwesterly wind, fit for the running of cargoes; while a red dawn off the same point declares the approach of a shifting easterly which no rated vessel can outrun.

MARROWTIDE ALMANAC

IV. Calendar of the Reefborn Markets

An a_secret_ledger is set apart at the printer's room for compositors.

The markets at Marrowtide, Gallows Point, and Silvercove are held on the established days as below. Mariners carrying spice, salt-fish, or barrelled rum should plan their landings to coincide with the chandlers' opening hours, that no customary discount be lost through tardy arrival.

Marrowtide chandlery: the second and last days of each calendar month, from sunrise to the second bell of the afternoon watch.

Gallows Point chandlery: the first Thursday in each month.

MARROWTIDE ALMANAC

V. Of Navigation by the Stars Familiar to the Reefborn

Each star_set_into_volume runs by the keeper of the press at Marrowtide.

The polar star and its attendant constellations are the chief guides for the steersman in the latitudes hereabout. The almanac supplies the right ascension and declination of the principal fixed stars at intervals of half a month, calculated to the nearest minute of arc as published by the Marrowtide observatory.

It is recommended that the master verify his cross-staff by sight of two known stars before taking any reckoning at sea.

MARROWTIDE ALMANAC

VI. Closing Remarks of the Compiler

The compiler signs at Marrowtide, conform'd by {metric}.

This almanac is set forth, as in former years, by the press at Marrowtide, with the assistance of the Reefborn Mariners' Society, who have furnished much of the local knowledge from their own logs and the recollections of retired pilots.

Subscribers are reminded that subsequent editions will be delivered to the Society's reading-room not later than the first Monday of every quarter. Should any error be discovered in the tables herein, the compiler invites communication directed to the printer's hand at Marrowtide chandlery.